Main contractor: If you get a general builder to build your home they will, by default, be project managing the process - a great option if they've come recommended or you've seen evidence of their good work. However, you will pay a premium for this route rather than employing trades yourself, and you'll have less direct control of the project.

Who Can Manage My Project? - Build It

For a larger home renovation, you'll want the oversight of a GC if one is still within the budget. A general contractor will be the one who finds the rest of the subcontractors (plumbers, electricians, A/C companies, painters, etc.), schedules them in order based on progress, and is also held responsible for keeping people on track for deadlines.
